The aim of this study is to test the hypothesis that an early demonstration of a patent ductus arteriosus (PDA) by ultrasound and color flow Doppler (CFD) criteria may obviate the need for further diagnostic testing. This is a retrospective review of 332 consecutive patients with a suspicious fetal heart murmur, diagnosed as having a PDA by color and pulsed wave Doppler. They were followed after birth with color and CFD and echocardiography to confirm the presence or absence of a PDA. Of the 332 patients, 197 had a minimum of 2 weeks of follow-up and PDA, if present, was confirmed on echocardiography. Of the remaining patients, after birth, all 149 were confirmed to have a PDA, 42 to have pulmonary stenosis and 10 to have a ventricular septal defect. In the whole cohort, 20% of patients with a negative echocardiogram had a positive echocardiogram. Among patients without confirmed echocardiographic PDA, 52% had a positive CFD and 100% had a positive echocardiogram. The sensitivity of the CFD is therefore low (52%), and it cannot be relied upon as the diagnostic tool in the majority of cases. In contrast, the high specificity and negative predictive value of CFD (89-95%) make it a useful method for excluding PDA. In this cohort of low risk patients, early demonstration of a PDA by echocardiography and CFD rarely alters the management.Q: Как создать анимацию для спинки, которая отклоняется немного от горизонта Есть разметка:
